A Tel Aviv apartment designed for a family of 5 with 3 young children.

The design concept tests the thin line between groundedness and airiness, between silence and strength. A careful palette of natural materials, light coloured, lightly textured, subtle but present, was assembled gradually.

The bedrooms are all located in the southern part of the apartment, overlooking a beautiful public garden. The kitchen, lounge and stairs to the roof terrace are located on the northern part with 3 natural air directions.

In the beginning of the process a few key areas were chosen in which we decided to puncture the roof with skylights in order to introduce daylight to the deeper parts of the apartment and to allow plants to lightness of movement in space but also to allow a resting point, a pause to sit down on the way in or out, with the first two risers as wide benches wrapping an existing supporting column and spreading towards the kitchen.

The staircase required great design care and close collaboration between us and the ironmonger, the structural engineer, the parquet supplier and the joiner. The stairs are made of steel and was hung from above with only one anchor point holding it down to the floor – a small walk – in entrance wardrobe under the landing. The handrail was custom punctured according to the general design scheme. Parquet planks were inserted into ‘steel baths’ flush with the steel edges.

The guest WC is hidden behind a bank of entrance cupboard doors camouflaged and understated.

have a comfortable, spacious, relaxed space for exercising and for family time. The design also includes an outdoor kitchen, a hot tub, a dining area and lounge.

The furniture in the project is a combination of old family pieces and new items that were purchased together in different stores.
